There have been only a few school mergers in the state, and Vito Gagliardi Jr., Porzio's managing principal, said that if a countywide district is created "this would be the grandest example of school consolidation in the history of New Jersey."

The study could be the first in a series of consolidation efforts, as officials look for way to tame New Jersey's highest-in-the-nation average property tax bills.

"There are I wouldn't necessarily say countywide opportunities but certain sections of certain counties, depending on geography and depending on enrollment, depending on finances, that may look at this," Gagliardi said.
